Theme: Fostering a Humane and Green Future: Pathways to Inclusive Societies and Sustainable Development

Introduction:

The World Health Organization reported that the COVID-19 pandemic is about to end; hence, it will still remain as a public health priority worldwide. Its adverse effects on businesses, households, national government and the environment become history. The recovery might be slower in the near future as structural adjustments have to be undertaken to reverse these devastating impacts to the societies and the environment that triggered greater social inequalities and imbalances in the environment.

Together with businesses and government, the role of science, engineering and technology in committing and transforming valuable resources that support sustainable development cannot be discounted. Researchers, policymakers and other development advocates must closely collaborate in providing real-time information and/or shifting their priorities to achieve the 2030 sustainable development initiatives. In line with these efforts, research universities and international funding agencies can help researchers in conducting meaningful research activities and in shifting their priorities towards the creation and transfer of knowledge and skills, and the development of scientific discoveries and innovative business activities among small and start-up businesses. Finding solutions to the existing and potential problems by seizing opportunities, aided by data analytics and other technology-based devices, business and scientific models, sensitivity analysis and other state-of-the-art tools, is key in removing roadblocks that thwart the creation of more inclusive and humane societies. Through effective policy initiatives, regulatory and legal frameworks, and other initiatives, greener and sustainable growth, scientific innovations and technological advancements will flourish and revive soon. All these at the forefront of every research activity can provide meaningful contributions in building a greener and sustainable future.
